

TRANSCRIPT PREPARED BY THE CLERK OF THE LEGISLATURE
Transcriber's Office
FLOOR DEBATE

May 15, 2001

LB 536

he's looking at it. If the only thing that we had in this equation was the American farmer on one hand and the world market on the other, that's one thing. But you've got somebody else in there who is helping to devastate the condition of the American farmer and that's these huge multinational agribusiness companies because they are the ones who are going to tell these farmers in America, you're going to take what I give you. If you don't sell your stuff to me, nobody is going to buy it. So you've got a sieve that you have to pass through before you even get to the world market. There are other people who are fighting back and forth at the world level. The farmer, as I was mentioning to I think it was Senator Kremer, is always a stationary target because the farmer is rooted to that land. The land cannot be moved. The farmer cannot move from that land. The farmer is always the target. I do not disagree with Senator Wehrbein and others on this floor who have talked from time to time about the amount realized by a middle person which leaves the farmer out, basically. So if you look at what the consumer is paying for a finished product, even when you factor in a reasonable profit for those who get that product along the way and put it in the finished state, there still is more that they're deriving than is necessary to have a decent profit, and the farmer is being left out, basically, because the farmer has no choice, or not much in the way of a choice. So in desperation, I agree, the person who is farming is going to say I am going to produce more since I'm getting less, hoping that by producing more, I'll at least get what I was getting before the bottom started falling out. But the big purchasers of these grains know what is going to happen. They know that the farmers are going to panic. They know that as soon as it sets into the farmer's brain that the price is going down, the producers of that commodity are going to run out and immediately start to plant more, produce more, have a bigger surplus, and depress the price even more. And I, who am going to buy, do not have to buy more of your grain. I can just wait. The surplus is so big now that what these farmers in America do, no matter what it is, will have absolutely no impact on the surplus that's in the world now. If they add to it, they increase their misery. But they are not going to add enough to affect the world price substantially. But there are people who are looking at the world view and they will know, not just what's happening today,